LADY FIXINGS. HER GIPA.

Our young friend Geo. W. Ferrell, the poetaster of the Boonville Buzzard, which fluir persists in styling an Eagle, lets his goeling soul loose in this gush over a wormy little prig of dog-fennel that he mistook for a rose-bud: She gave me a sweet red cose.

She gave me a sweet red cose.

With dainy leaves, and tips that atood apar.

I took it fonding, and till evening a close,

Wore it against my heart.

f knew it would fade away
And quickly wither, then return to dust,
But yet it blessed me, and I let it stay—
A treasure and a trust.

A fressure and a frust.

An embine, of course, it had,
And when questioned her what if might belier cheeks were binshes, but I saw the giad
Beply she meant for me.

"Surely it is not mine
To know the embiem of the rose so red,
But if 'us good, why then, it shall be thine
Ferwermore,' she said

there and over seain. Over and over again
I searched my bock amid the twilight hour,
Hunting so patiently, yet not in vain,
The language of the flower.

Then, happily, when we met One evening mure, and stars were on the sea, I copyly told her she must not forget The grif she promised me.

The grift she promised me.

Enchantingly from above
The mountight real, and frembivd in her hatrIne mountight real, and frembivd in her hatris the broaded and looked more fair.

And thus due it lake the rose—
The sweet red rose with lips that stood apart,
And finely kept it, and, till evening a close,
Wore it against my bearing a close,
Wore it against my bearing.

The flower soon fadded way,
And passed in perfaine on the breeze's sigh,
Out through the sun set when the pailld day
Fiel down the western sky.

But still the love I source.

But still the love | source.
That love she gave me it the rose's heart,
Blooms into be sury and shall never more
Out of my life depart.
